HARTFORD:

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 30, 1863.

Services in commemoration of Abraham Lincoln were universally observed throughout the country yesterday, and were of the most solemn and impressive character. Places of business were closed, churches opened, and appropriate military and civic ceremonies performed. Nearly every building in the land was draped in mourning.

Obsequies of President Lincoln.

Wednesday, April 29th, will long be remembered as one of the most successful in the history of the American people. On that day the obsequies, with honors heretofore unknown, were held in paying the last tokens of respect to the mortal remains of Abraham Lincoln. In every city, town and village in the land, services were conducted, according to the solemn and impressive forms which the hand of an afflicted nation commanded. The grief which overpowered the whole country immediately on the announcement of the assassination of our President, continued to every household as if one of their own nearest and dearest friends. In the streets of those who had become professionally endeared to all loyal hearts by a kindly, good, faith that he had redeemed an irreparable personal loss.

Mr. Lincoln's public life was stormy in the extreme. Called from the seclusion of a remote home to the chief magistracy of the nation, at a time when treason was dragging one half of the country with savage ferocity into the vortex of revolt, and when a large minority in the other half openly justified the acts of the conspirators, he met the task, guiding the ship with heroic courage and for eighteen months, through the storms of the tempest to the very borders of peace. Under his guidance the military power of the forces of all rebellion was crushed, the most stupendous war in the history of the world was pushed to a successful close, liberty was given to four millions of bondmen, and the pledge for the first time was made truly free. From the first he was the object of the opposition, and the hope to the downtrodden. His acts were besieged by treachery, and even his truthful and honest means of criminals could never be divested of calumny. Through all the vicissitudes of his life he remained a remarkable degree the embodiment of the people, and at the moment of his death, probably no man was ever more profoundly or universally beloved by his countrymen. It is neglect in the prospect that the leader who had served them so faithfully, was at the point of expiry that repose in office which he had so richly earned.

While the murderers act of the assassin has robbed the nation of its chief, and thrown a fearful gloom, the devil will not interrupt for a moment the onward progress of our cause. The enemies of the republic does not depend upon the life of any man. The people are the power, who work as it did the last, and who have forestalled horror of the barbarous of slavery. Mr. Lincoln's leading thought was for them, to lead the ranks of treason. But the blow which pretended him, will pursue the traitor to the gallows with avenging fury from the face of the civilized earth. It will add another link of misery to the cord of slavery, deepening still further the detestation in which all good men of the civilized world compare will turn pity to contempt, and scorn to jest. The air of America can no more give life to Davis, Breckinridge, Benjamin, and other leaders, whose diabolism inaugurated the tragedy of Friday night. The only alternative now left them is fight or die halter. Peace will be anticipated by the roots. Mr. Lincoln might have accused the devils whose power has led to his assassination from the arm of justice, but his Christian will not. The government will have to a position to dictate terms. The sinker
